

Rutland

Sunday, 24 February 2008

Last Updated Saturday, 10 May 2008

Rutland is England's smallest county. It was a traditional county until its county council was abolished in 1974. The entity of Rutland reappeared in 1997 and the authority that controls it uses the traditional county council arms.

A banner of the arms is thus the county's flag although a simplified version of this design is generally available commercially, which is perhaps not quite as attractive.

This is the commercially available version

Jason Saber